CHAPTER I

Tora Bora

Falcon Agency's assault team along with their two Afghani friends were seven miles away from the Tora Bora cave complex. It was raining, as it had been for the past two days. Even though it created horrible conditions for the mission, it kept the enemy under cover and out of sight. The Al Qaeda and Taliban were keeping a low profile and that made Falcon's job a lot easier for the time being. All indications were that Usamah bin Laden, along with some of his top military aides, associates and family were hiding within the deep cave grotto. The United States, aided by its allies, was bombarding all known regional Al Qaeda and Taliban headquarters, bases and weapon storage caches. Each day, America's attacks were successfully achieved and the enemy was on the run or digging in deeper under the bombing onslaught.

Daniel was lying down inside Falcon's hidden cavern, knowing that the number one enemy of the world was not far away. Even though they had received the devastating news from their operations headquarters in Turkey, he had a hard time comprehending that the United States had been attacked and hundreds upon hundreds of people were killed or injured by bin Laden's team of terrorists.

The Afghanistan mission started with the highest intent of bringing Usamah bin Laden to justice before the world. That was the original objective but while Falcon was deep in the hostile mountainous Afghan country, the mission's importance had escalated to an even higher goal. They were half way into their assignment to bin Laden's suspected hideout in Tora Bora along the Pakistan, Afghanistan border when they received the shocking news that the September 11, 2001 massacre had occurred. Due to radio and satellite phone precautions, full details of the attack weren't given to the elite assault team. When the brief report was received, controlled anger, fortitude and drive to get Usamah, had escalated in every member's mind.

Dirty, exhausted, and lying down on his sleeping bag in the dark hovel in the mountain, Daniel wished he could take a long hot shower. His hardened lean muscular body was in peak condition but the constant frigid temperatures and rain was beginning to take its toll on his mental outlook. Thoughts about the recent dramatic turn of events in the world also plagued his mind.

"How were Susan, his family and friends responding to the tragic events?" he thought. "Damn, I wish I was with her and the kids."

In the dark shadows of the cave illuminated by two kerosene lanterns, he could see his close associates also lying down trying to capture the much-needed rest they would need for the upcoming evening's assault. Knowing his friends, their thoughts were more than likely the same as his. If bin Laden was in Tora Bora, they would get him and as many of his Al Qaeda cadre as possible. They had been instructed to enforce "extreme prejudice" to the situation, meaning to assassinate all in sight no matter whom or what affiliation, age or sex were present. Daniel had no problem with carrying out the order and his fellow team members wouldn't either. Once the mission had started and contact with the enemy had engaged, there were no holds barred. In four hours they would be entering the Tora Bora killing zone.

As bombs were being dropped within three miles of Falcon's cavern sheltered location by high-flying United States bombers and attacking jets, the ground inside the cave shook.

Dirt and small rocks occasionally fell from the ceiling and walls, creating danger inside their hidden den. The men were sleeping in a group near the center of the small cave. Outside Amad and Darryl were keeping a close vigilance for roving enemy soldiers. Daniel pulled his sleeping bag close to his chilled body and quietly drifted off to sleep. His comforting sleeping thoughts drifted to past year experiences with his family. It brought escape from the current situation that was unfolding and a smile appeared on the sleeping assassin's face when visions of his family appeared in his dream.
