Prologue

Cassie almost hit the car head on, but swerved at the very last second to avoid a horrible collision. The other driver blasted their horn and did some fist shaking and “sign language” with one finger. Her thoughts were so scattered lately, she wondered if she should even be behind the wheel. She decided it must be time to stop for some strong coffee and a brisk walk to regain some mental faculties before traveling on to Windmill. It was only another 100 miles or so. Thank God.

The past few weeks of disaster in her life had nearly drained her. Exactly two weeks ago, she abruptly lost her long-time dream job in Denver Colorado as a Style Coordinator at a very posh upscale clothing store. The owner had a huge scandal of some sort, and informed all of the employees that the store would be closing permanently. No further explanation was given, just “the doors will be locked in two weeks”. If that wasn’t depressing enough, last week her apartment building caught on fire, and she lost everything she owned. Luckily no pets or people were injured, but she was forced to find a weekly rental at a motel and buy a few personal items to get by on until she could make a new plan. After a few days in the dingy, rundown motel, Cassie decided a fresh start was exactly what she needed. Her favorite Aunt Lizzy still lived in the little town of Windmill Kansas where Cassie had grown up, and it was high time to pay her a visit. After a refreshing visit with Lizzy, she could move on to parts unknown and start a whole new chapter in her life. She literally had nothing to lose since she was unemployed, had a few dollars saved, and the fire took care of all of her “worldly possessions”. She was free as a bird to go anywhere she wanted. At least that’s what she thought...
