place. He took his time and smiled to himself as he worked. He was in no rush to finish. It seemed to Little Mouse that the man found great satisfaction in the work he was doing.

She was thinking that the new house would make a nice summer home. I could build a nest under the floor in one corner. I would be out of his way and not have to climb the tree to get home. Perhaps I could even get to know the man and have a friend. She was somewhat afraid, though she had no reason to be. Her parents had not taught her to be afraid of people, but then, they had never seen people either.

Her parents did teach her to be afraid of the great owl, the hawk, the fox, and all the other animals that hunt mice for food. People – well, this was something new. She wondered what her parents would say if they were here. Now Little Mouse faced a hard decision in her life: should she try to meet the stranger, or – stay by herself and remain safe?
