SOME PEOPLE HAVE A TERRIBLE TIME
GETTING READY
(Tony Volger Was One of These)

Detective Jenkins recognized the man from the picture Warden Smith had given him. “Tony Volger?”

“Pssst!” At the name, the man’s features appeared to collapse. “I don’t use that name any more. I’m Ansel Hansen, now.”

“Ansel Hansen?”

“Right. What are you looking for?”

“I’d like to talk with you for a few minutes.” Jenkins flipped open his wallet to his credentials. “I’m Andrew Jenkins, from the Midvale Bureau of Corrections.”

Hansen gave a resigned shrug. “All right.”

He turned on the fluorescent light and sat behind the desk with its rudimentary switchboard. He offered the detective the old—fashioned wooden chair beside the desk and said, “We may be interrupted. I answer the phones on this shift.”

“That’s O.K.” Jenkins said. He couldn’t let the conversation end there. Warden Smith had said his prospect would try to convert him. He hoped that would give him an opening. Would Hansen try?

After a moment’s silence, the man shifted, as if to rise.

Jenkins made an effort to keep him talking. “I’m interested in knowing how you managed to overcome your record,” he said hurriedly. “You never were into violence, I believe.”

Hansen shifted in his chair. “No.” He looked glumly at the desk, using his thumbnail to scratch off a piece of tape stuck along its edge, then took a couple of deep breaths. “Near the end of my last term in the can I met two guys who changed my life, an old guy and a young guy.”

“Oh?” Jenkins was careful to show interest. “Were these guards or fellow prisoners?”

Hansen snorted. “Neither. The old guy was Isaiah.”

“Isaiah?”
