

Mark G. Malvasi

Standing within, but also in critical opposition to, the poetic tradition that Walt Whitman established, "Dark Fields" questions the American hope for millennial perfection. Emphasizing the judgments of history, these poems cast doubt on the conviction that America is the City of God and that Americans are His Chosen People.

Dark Fields

A City on a Hill*

Why have you come to this new land, this city on a hill, living always in the shadow of God, somber and luminous, this brilliant, mad failure, cursed and divided between the saved and the damned? The beacon summoned; all depends on the beam of light that shines forth now in artificial splendor to reassure that the fingerprint of God marks every puddle, and that every dog urinating on a wall has a divine mission

*The title derives from John Winthrop's description of the New World in "A Modell of Christian Charity," the sermon he delivered in 1630 aboard the Arabella, bound for Massachusetts Bay Colony.

Poems and an Essay

The Real Thing

Car dealerships, motor homes casinos, gun shops, strip clubs Las Vegas, Disneyland, Silicon Valley, talk radio, reality TV, Coca-Cola, Big Macs, Super Bowls, opinion polls, innovation prodded to excess, the uninterrupted rhythm of fashion, the promiscuity of the moment, the anxious swirl of centrifugal force, the fierce concupiscence, the obscenity of liberation: the real America. This soft, air-conditioned hell at the edge of the world, this vulgar, mournful, scrap-heap paradise, abandoned by the gods, is paradise still. There is no other. Dark Fields

Always With You*

An infinity of faces, invisible, anonymous amnesiac, missing persons for whom no one is looking, lives unfolding into indifference, consigned to statistical tables and lists of endangered species, free to die second-class deaths. The only requirement is to leave without a trace, for poverty is an affront not credible, and the poor must be cast out, wiped off the face of the earth, for having shown such bad taste.

*The Gospel According to Matthew, 26:11; the Gospel According to Mark, 14:7.
